CONTRIBUTORS

Jeremy Cyrier completed a Master's in African History at the University of London, School of Oriental and African Studies and is a PhD student in African History at the University of Virginia.

Manelisi Genge earned a PhD in African History at Michigan State University in 1999. Currently, he is employed as a director of research in the Policy, Research and Analysis Unit in the Department of Foreign Affairs in the South African Government. He remains interested in African history and is one of the editors of H-South Africa.

Jennifer Hays is a PhD student in Anthropology at the State University of New York at Albany, focusing on issues of education, literacy and development as they affect the indigenous San populations of southern Africa. She is currently conducting fieldwork in Namibia with the Nyae Nyae Village Schools project, an alternative mother-tongue education project for the Ju/'hoansi.

Tricia Redeker Hepner is a PhD candidate in Anthropology at Michigan State University. Her research interests include diaspora and transnationalism, anthropology of the state, and power and identity in the context of globalization and international migration.

Katherine Luongo is a PhD student in history at the University of Michigan, Ann Arbor. Her primary field of research is interwar Kenya, and her most recent project addresses challenges that witchcraft-related crimes posed to the evolutionist model of justice in the 1930s in Kenya.

Worku Nida is a PhD student in the Department of Anthropology at UCLA, specializing in sociocultural anthropology. He is finishing his coursework and preparing for his qualifying exams and will be a PhD candidate by the end of Spring 2002. His research interests include entrepreneurship, migration, development, ethnohistory, and religious practices, especially traditional belief systems. He has published a book and several articles on Gurage history, culture and migration. Currently, he is developing a dissertation research project to study how and why the Gurage have become the preeminent entrepreneurs of Ethiopia.

Yvonne Teh is a PhD candidate at the University of Pennsylvania's Department of Anthropology. Her research interests include Tanzanian museums, complex societies, political anthropology and material culture.
