Mukat's Last Gift

Mortuary Customs Among the Cahuilla Indians

by Lowell J. Bean

Death is a universal experience that every culture must explain and deal with, and associated rituals are often the central focus of a society's religious life. In this absorbing study, anthropologist Lowell J. Bean draws upon fifty years of personal research and over a century of observations by others to present a detailed account of the many ways in which the creation story of the Cahuilla Indians of Southern California—in concert with the complex ceremonies surrounding death and the journey of the soul to the afterlife—explained, validated, and was interwoven into the entire life of a community coping with an occasionally harsh and unpredictable environment.

Before the Wilderness

Environmental Management by Native Californians

Compiled and Edited by Thomas C. Blackburn and Kat Anderson

The landscape Euro-Americans saw was not a wilderness, not untouched by nature. It was a landscape carefully managed by knowledgeable people to provide food, clothing, shelter, fuel, and tools. It was a landscape where the wilderness came later, after Euro-Americans had stopped the controlled burning the Indians had practiced, drained the wet meadows that had preserved the water supplies, and fenced off the areas where Native California women's coppicing had encouraged the growth of choice basketry materials. This is a book for those interested in the beginnings of agriculture, for here, in the salubrious climate of California, peoples who lived mainly by hunting and gathering had taken, by the eighteenth century, many of the steps that make up the technology of agriculture. This is also a book for those interested in learning better ways to manage our environment now. Our Forest Service and parks have already acknowledged the value of controlled burning.

You will gain great insight into the agricultural practices and resource management strategies that were used by California's native peoples.
