POETRY

WHISPERS
(for Jack Mapanje)

My ancestors too
have been to the mountain top;
from Kambiri point
they saw him
stand sentinel over
embryonic poets
scavenging the remains
of poetic inspiration
in Chingwe's hole.

They too
saw him fall into
the yawning abyss,
but tell it in broken
whispers of the dead dawn
and mime the mute
in the shifting sands
of the day.

The thump and tremors,
felt in Gordon and Red Squares, paralysed the subterranean serpent to frantic gesticulations
and impotence,
still strum the haunting tune
of question marks.

Was the fall
nature's making or
human design?
Wasn't he circumcised before?
Didn't he dance chopa
to need the foxtrot?
Didn't he immune his lines too,
from mythical rhapsodies,
to remain sacrosanct
and guard the changing
colours of chameleions?

My ancestors know too
that the little ones still salivate
on his pickled metaphors, modelling, traversing
the sand dunes of creativity, tossing about the time bomb, unsure to survive the censor's noose.
